Abstract

The focus of this thesis is to produce a three-dimensional image of rhetoric-ideological changes over a period of some 50 years (1948–2002) in election manifestos of the Left Party (vänsterpartiet) and the Conservative Party (moderaterna) of Sweden.

The parties have a clear purpose with their election manifestos: Vote for us! One primary condition to make it possible for a party to convince the voters of their own excellence is that their manifesto – in a concise format – treats political and ideological issues. The nature of these varies from time to time with conditions and changes in the world and within the party. However, irrespective of what factual matters the single manifesto brings forward, these are found in contexts with more or less clear rhetorical characteristics. This brings up the question of the rhetorical environment in which the political issues are discussed. Having as a point of departure the questions of when, what and how, the target has been to give this three-dimensional image. Via a distinction between content and form I distinguish lexical units which answer primarily to the question of what and those that have a stronger connection to the question of how.

Of the two studied parties, the Left Party is the one that shows the most obvious rhetorical characteristics. This is apparent mainly in the use of emotionally charged words, where the Left Party is far ahead of the Conservative Party with respect to both tokens and types during this period. However, it is possible to argue that the election manifestos of the Left Party are more interesting – in the sense of ‘more rewarding’ – also regarding the content-related units and categories.

KEYWORDS: lexical/political rhetoric, rhetorical dominance, manipulative language, semantics, emotionally charged words, manifesto.

© Thorwald Lorentzon

DISTRIBUTION: Institutionen för svenska språket
Box 200
405 30 Göteborg

ISSN: 1652-3105
SÄTTNING: Janne Saaristo
TRYCKNING: Elanders Infologistics Väst AB 2006