Abstract

The aim of this study is analyse the language used in chat channels of World of Warcraft to illustrate that players of World of Warcraft have adapted L337 language in order to suit their specific requirements in the game. By doing so the players have created a new variation of L337 Language: WoWspeak. We will find that players not only strive to create their own in-game jargon, but also they try to economise language as they attempt to mimic oral conversation as much as possible. The material analysed is computer-mediated conversations gathered from chat channels in the game.

1. Introduction

As an immediate consequence of the World Wide Web, people have learned to adapt their language, creating a new range of language varieties to cope with the linguistic drawbacks of computer-mediated communication (henceforth also referred to as CMC) and to take advantage of the opportunities that this new technology has brought. During this electronic revolution people have adapted the English language into a web-based variety type of English that is used on a daily basis in online message boards and chat rooms, mobile instant messaging and computer games. David Crystal refers to this jargon as Netspeak. There is a specific type of Netspeak that hackers use, called L337 language, which has evolved further to form a new jargon used by people in Massively Multiplayer Online Roll Playing Games (MMORPG). Players have adapted L337 language to suit their identity, environment and culture. Players vary their vocabulary, grammar and syntax to meet the game’s mechanics and needs.

In virtual worlds, such as World of Warcraft, people can engage in a text-based fantasy interaction. This whole phenomenon started with something called the multi-user dungeon (MUD). MUDs combined action games with instant message text chatting. This created a social universe that required its own special terms and special linguistic conventions. L337 language has eventually developed to offer players a computer based communication where they can adopt new identities, explore new worlds, interact with other players and make this world part of their own cultural identity.

1.1 Aim

This study was carried out on the computer game World of Warcraft (WoW). MMORPGs, the type of game WoW is, derived from MUDs. At the moment, this is one of the MMORPGs with most active players with over 11.5 million subscribers (Press Releases, 2008, Blizzard Entertainment) worldwide. The aim of this study is to prove how the influence of L337 language over the English language has led to a new jargon, henceforth referred to as WoWspeak, in order to fulfil the players’ communication needs.
1.2 Netspeak

The “manifestations of the electronic revolution, along with chat rooms, discussion groups, and game environments, gave rise to a new domain of study, called variously ‘electronic discourse’, ‘computer-mediated communication’ (CMC) or (more succinctly) ‘Netspeak’” (Crystal 1995:424).

David Crystal states that Netspeak can be of two types: “Depending on whether the interaction takes place in real time (synchronous) or in postponed time (asynchronous)” (Crystal 2001:11). The present study analyses the game World of Warcraft, which is a synchronous environment where communication takes place in real time.

In this type of environment, language is the only way players can portray their culture since communication takes place in a virtual world. In WoW, players are not able to show their real self, the only way they can show themselves to other players is through their in-game characters and most importantly: their words. So it is how the player expresses him or herself that will determine the player’s personality while playing the game. Whether a player decides to choose one word or expression or another will determine how ‘cool’ or not this player is. This is not the purpose of this study, but it seems reasonable to believe that language use represents social status in the game as well as how players perceive each other’s personality.

1.3 L337 Language

According to Mitchell, during the late 1970’s and the early 1980’s computer bulletin board systems (BBS) started ‘the phone phreak culture’. These individuals explored the US phone system to make illegal long distance calls. With BBS they found a written channel to communicate and help others who were not as skilled. For convenience many words and sentences were shortened, words like you or your would be written as u and ur.

In this BBS, there were internet relay chat system operators, commonly known as moderators, who were granted admin privileges in order to validate user’s discussions and monitor conversations in order that all legal rules were applied. Moderators would have a wordlist with words such as porn or ware that would be blocked immediately or would not publish any type of content that included those words.

Eventually, to circumvent all BBS language restrictions, and to talk about forbidden topics, users would replace numbers and punctuation marks for letters, this way they could distribute, store and discuss pornography or distribute stolen software in a discrete way that would fool the BBS’s language restrictions.

BBS administrators soon caught on to their system and started banning some L337 language translations. This just encouraged hackers to refine their new language into even less recognizable translations. As an example, the word ‘Hacker’ would have been translated into $h4xor$ and in its latest and more elaborate stage into $l-l^<<()lz$. Those users who gained rights to access restricted areas within BBS were granted with an ‘elite’ label, thus the name ‘elite language’ (Mitchell 2005).

Nowadays we find traces of this language in text messaging, e-mails, instant messengers and, as this study shows, in online computer games.

L337 language is made out of an alternative alphabet that combines ASCII characters with Latinate letters. Appendix 1 is an example of what the Latinate alphabet would look like in L337 language. This alphabet is not fixed since L337 language is constantly changing. Just as Nigel Ross (Ross 2006: 43) says: “Individuality and variety are key features of l337 speak, and creativity is a plus, especially when more and more leet-speak terms are being borrowed by chatters and messengers”

1.4 World of Warcraft

Blizzard Entertainment are the creators behind World of Warcraft, a massively multiplayer online roll playing game where subscribers play together online and fight against the virtual world in the game and each other. World of Warcraft was originally an English MMORPG; the game has expanded and nowadays it offers eight different server languages: Chinese, English, French, German, Korean, Russian, Spanish and Thai.

1.4.1 In-game communication

There are different types of written communication in the game. Each one can be of interest depending on what is being studied. There are two main methods to communicate, via server channels or via chat modes.

2. A practical example of L337 language can be seen at http://www.google.es/webhp?hl=xx-hacker where the entire search engine of Google is translated into L337 language.
1.4.1.1 Server channels

Server channels are different depending where the player is. By default, each player joins the channels automatically when they enter a zone. These channels are the following:

- General channel: used to establish conversation with other players within a specific zone.
- Local Defence channel: this channel alerts players that are within the same zone of attacks carried out by players of the other faction. For example, if a player attacks a town of the other faction, the players who have joined the channel will receive a message saying that the town is being attacked. The players can then discuss the tactics for a counterattack.
- Looking For Group channel: This channel is used by players that are looking for other members to form a party or a raid group in order to carry out certain quests. Due to the nature of the channel, it influences the type of vocabulary used in it.
- Trade channel: The trade channel only works inside major cities. It is used to sell, trade or buy items. As with the Looking For Group channel, the channel’s purpose also affects the vocabulary in it.

1.4.1.2 Chat modes

There are different types of chat modes. Each type is used depending on the purpose of communication that the player wants to achieve at that specific moment.

- Say mode: This chat mode broadcasts the player’s message to all the other players in its vicinity.
- Yell mode: Yelling, in WoW, transmits a message to all players in a large area around the player who is sending the message.
- Whisper mode: Players whisper when they want to send a private message to another player.
- Party mode: Party mode allows the player to chat only with those members who are in his or her party. This avoids cluttering the chat window for other players who are not in the same party. Party mode is only broadcasted to five members. If the group is formed by 6 members or more it is not called party chat anymore but raid chat. Due to the fact that this mode is usually used while playing and not just chatting, I believe that the language found in it reveals a close relationship between the players in it and especially in raid chat the amount of imperatives increases significantly as can be seen after analysing the material.
• Guild mode: This type of communication broadcasts a message to all the players in the same guild, no matter where they are. The language used in this channel also shows a close link amongst players.

The only types of communication relevant to this study are server channels, guild mode and party/raid mode.

2. Method and Material

2.1 Method

Chat environment in World of Warcraft is similar to other types of chat-rooms on the web. This study presents observations and examines the language used in public channels: Trade channel, General channel, Party channel, Raid mode and Guild mode. World of Warcraft also offers private channels, (‘whisper’, ‘say’ and ‘yell’ mode) but this type of communication is not suitable for the study since it is the general usage of English that is analysed, not the variation between individuals who have close relationships, since this type of communication is adapted to meet other communicative needs.

2.1.1 Gathering Material

The material was gathered with the help of a program called Elephant (Curse 2010) that recorded all the messages broadcasted into the selected channels and chat modes. The program was configured to show times tamps so that it would be possible to delimit the time intervals.

The complete logs can be found in Appendix 7.5 at the end of this paper. The logs show the date in which the recording took place, time of the interval recorded, exact time when the message was broadcasted, nickname of the player who sent the message, in brackets, and the message, as in example 1. below:

1. 21:03:56 [Cyű]: any1 have a dreadstone for sale?

In this example we can see that the player Cyű said “any1 have a dreadstone for sale” at exactly 21:03:56.
In the game players can link objects, spells or other information into the channels and chat modes. When the player links any of the elements mentioned, the information appears between squared brackets. In the example below, the player linked the objects “Cardinal Ruby” and “King’s Amber”.

2. 21:04:12 [Damonster]: i got some [Cardinal Ruby] & [King's Amber] if anyone needs

2.1.2 Recording

In order to get fair results and to get better a representation of traffic loads, an attempt was made to choose different intervals to gather the material. Therefore, the study analyses logs from Monday from 11:45 to 12:45, Wednesday from 21:00 to 22:00, Saturday from 09:30 to 10:30 and Sunday from 11:45 to 12:45. With these intervals we achieve all type of players: adult, young, experienced and inexperienced players as well as all types of traffic loads: low, medium and high.

For this study none of the players present at the times of the logs were notified that their communication was being observed in order to avoid positive or negative influence in the study.

2.2 Material

2.2.1 Delimiting the Material

The study only takes into consideration all the unique messages in English from real players. With this purpose in mind, some of the material within the logs has been discarded for one of several reasons. The information that has been discarded still appears in the logs but it has been crossed out. The reasons for discarding messages were the following:

- Spam messages. These type of messages are “off-topic and lengthy messages sent to a chatgroup” (Crystal 2004:99). They are sent by companies who sell gold (WoW currency) to players and this is one of their advertising methods. Since they are not written by players they are thus discarded.

- Repetitions. All except one of the identical messages sent by a same player are discarded. If there is any change in the message, whether it is an extra space between two words, another exclamation mark or a change in any of the numbers in the message, it is considered a unique message.
• Other languages. Messages in other languages are not studied since they are not relevant to this paper.

• Add-on messages. Many players have small programs installed to their games called Add-ons. These programs sometimes broadcast messages in chat modes. Since these messages are not actually written by players, they are considered to be irrelevant to the study and are not taken into consideration.

• Game messages. One of the best qualities of World of Warcraft is the ability it has to submerge the player into the game and make him/her believe they are in another world. To achieve this, the non-playable characters, the ones controlled by the game, often talk, yell or send messages to the players. Since these messages are not actually written by players, they were also ignored.

2.2.2 Extracting Data

After obtaining the logs for the same days and time periods during two different weeks and analysing the results obtained, all deviations from Standard English and L337 language were registered and noted in order to be classified to help analyse the phenomenon of how players have adapted L337 language to form WoWspeak. Due to the limited scope of this essay it is not possible to take into account social variables such as age, gender and location, though these variables are certainly interesting and worthy of study in future research on the subject.

In order to extract the information relevant to this study, a thorough analysis was carried out to search for all emoticons, abbreviations, acronyms and any other types of word formation and variation from the logs. In order to identify what abbreviations and acronyms where standard English, all results were processed through the search engine of the online version of Cambridge Dictionary (Cambridge Dictionary 2010) and Merriam-Webster Dictionary (Meriam-Webster Dictionary 2010). All the results that gave no hits were further classified into L337 language and WoWspeak.

3. Results

As mentioned earlier in section 2.1, the study analyses all unique messages broadcasted in the guild and party/raid chat modes and in the general and trade channels. Out of the 998 unique messages broadcasted by different players in the game World of Warcraft, 208 messages were from the guild chat, 513 from the raid chat, 425 from the trade channel and 5 from the general channel.

The study analyses the unique messages in the material for word formation and written speech.

3.1 Word formation

Word formation is one of the most important phenomena that occurs in WoWspeak. Players create new words in order to perform a function that in most cases cannot be expressed in Standard English. I believe that in WoWspeak, there are different types of word formation taking place: addition, reduction, innovation and change in function.

3.1.1 Addition

One of the most common addition procedures that takes place in WoWspeak is affixation. Through addition, players use their basic knowledge in Standard English to create new words. The basic affixes used are the following:

- -er: This suffix is used to refer to people or things that perform a certain activity. Examples of this are: caster (a person who casts), dps’er (a person who does DPS); an example of these words in user is: ‘All casters and dps’ers have to move close to the wall’.

- re-: This prefix is used to add the meaning 'do again'. Examples of this are: to rebuff (to cast a spell on someone again), relog (to log out and in again) and reflask (to drink a flask again).

- un-: Used to add the meaning ‘lack of’ to a word. For example: untanked fight (a fight with no tank).

- de-: Used to add the meaning of ‘remove’. For example: debuff (to remove a buff).

- -wise: Used to indicate ‘related to’. For example: dps wise (related to dps).

- off-: Used to indicate ‘away from’. For example: offspec (opposite of the main specialization)

Another feature observed in the analysed material is compounding. As it can be seen throughout the material, compounding tends to take place between a WoW related term and a Standard English term. An example of this is the compounding of the words spell and caster to form the compound spellcaster.

3 See glossary for the WoWspeak meaning of Tank.

3.1.2 Reduction

One of the most characteristic processes of word formation in WoWspoken is reduction. As will be explained later on in section 4, Discussion, reduction is the most effective way of making communication faster. In this type of word formation, WoWspoken uses all three types of reduction: back formation, abbreviation and acronyms.

Back formation is one of the least common types of reduction in WoWspoken. Out of the 998 unique messages gathered there were only 2 results of back formation: the term Main, from the original term ‘main character’; and Trash, from the original term ‘trash mobs’.

Abbreviations, together with acronyms, are the most common type of word formation in WoWspoken. Throughout the 998 unique messages there were a total of 456 abbreviations out of which 163 of them could also be used in L337 language and only 45 of them are used in Standard English. As shown in the pie chart below, 10% of all abbreviations could have been used in Standard English, 36% could have been used in L337 language and 54% can only be used in WoWspoken.

5 The term trash mob derives from the term yard trash which was coined in the late 1990s MMORPG Everquest. (Mob 2010, WoWwiki [online])
A full list of all the abbreviations can be found in the Appendix. The terms are sorted in alphabetical order and the explanations have been obtained from WoWWiki (WoWWiki 2010).

As mentioned earlier, acronyms are a common type of word formation. Out of a total of 347 acronyms found, 13% of the acronyms could also be used in Standard English and 13% could also be used in L337 language. The pie chart below offers a visual representation of these results. As shown in the graph, 74% of the acronyms found in the material can only be used in WoW speak.

A full list of all the acronyms can be found in the Appendix. The results are arranged in alphabetical order and the explanations have been gathered from WoWWiki (WoWWiki 2010) and Cambridge Dictionary online (Cambridge Dictionary online 2010).

3.1.3 Innovation

In World of Warcraft, players also create new words in order to make up for the lack of terminology that is not accessible in L337 language or in Standard English. During this process, players create new words either by borrowing a term from Standard English and adapting its meaning or by creating the term from scratch. For example, players who use WoW speak have borrowed the term cap and have adapted the term so that it suits their WoW meaning, in this case a limit in equipment.
The perfect way to show a neologism is the verb to ding. This verb comes from the onomatopoeic sound, ding. When a player levels up, the game makes a dinging sound that indicates to the player that he or she has gained one more level. It is therefore that when a player levels up players say for example: ‘I just dinged’ or ‘Until I ding’.

Another term that has been borrowed is the term farming. In Standard English the term means “the practice of agriculture or aquaculture” (Farming 2010, Merriam-Webster [online]). In WoW, this term means to kill a certain creature repeatedly to get a certain item or money. It can also be extended to include searching for ore, herbs or any other type of material used in WoW professions. This term has a synonym: to grind, that happens to be also a borrowed word from Standard English.

The terms melee and ranged are also borrowed terms. In WoW the terms have been adapted from the meaning in Standard English and in WoWspeak they are now used to determine the distance from the creature or boss being killed and the position of the player. If the player is at a close distance it is said that the player is a melee, and if the player is at a further distance it is said to be ranged. Examples 3 and 4 show how these words are used in WoWspeak:

3. 21:04:12 21:30:36 [Damonster]: Ximaira chain healing melees is nice

4. 21:28:33 [Cyñ]: who is ranged running to?

Two terms that also have been borrowed are tank and ninja. The term tank has kept the idea behind the meaning in Standard English. A tank is a vehicle built to protect, the same idea remains in the WoWspeak term tank, the difference is that in WoWspeak, it refers to a player that fights the boss so that other players will not get attacked, this player literally absorbs all damage. The term ninja also known as ninja looter, refers to a “player who takes loot which he or she is not entitled”. This term originated with the notion of picking up an item as fast as possible (Ninja 2010, WoWwiki [online]).

Another interesting term found was to pop. The word borrowed from the Standard English verb ‘pop’: “to take (pills) especially frequently or habitually” (Pop 2010, Merriam Webster [online]). The idea that still remains behind the WoWspeak term is that the player actually eats, drinks or casts something to him/herself or to other players.
3.1.4 Change of function and derivation

After analysing all the material it becomes clear that change of function and derivation are also very common techniques used by players in order to create new words.

Usually players make a change in function or derivation when they need a term that is not available in either Standard English or L337 language.

One of the most important derivations takes place when players create a noun based on the material that an object is made out of or based on the position the player is situated in. For instance, the terms flask, mail and plate. In the case of mail and plate this refers to an object made out of such material. For example a player could say “Only plate dropped”, what the player means with this is that an item made out of plate dropped, not an actual piece of plate (metal). In the case of flask the general idea is the same, instead of referring to the container the liquid is stored in, it refers to the liquid inside the actual bottle. In Standard English the same might occur with the term cup: “I drank a cup” (of coffee), the difference is that in Standard English the speaker, in order to communicate fully the message, it should be understood that it is a cup of coffee. In WoWspreek, the players do not have to mention what type of liquid is inside the flask.

Regarding change in function, noun to verb conversion is one of the most common resources used by players. For example ‘to dps’ comes from the acronym DPS (damage per second), and what the players have done is convert it into a verb to indicate doing damage in a fight. At the same time the same term (DPS) can also be used as a noun in two different scenarios: firstly as the actual damage and secondly as the player who deals the damage itself. For example:

5. 21:14:56 [Ferone]: You can't dps when you're dead..

6. 09:52:50 [Detit]: LFM onyxia need ttank and ranged dps!!!

In example number 6, ‘DPS’ is referred to as the person who is dealing the damage. Another WoWspreek term for this would be dpser.

The table below shows the results found during the study and specifies the process of function change and exemplifies the use of the WoWspreek term.

3.2 Written speech

One of the main objectives of WoWspk is to make it resemble as much, as possible, spoken language. This is why players use certain techniques to accomplish this: pronunciation-based words, use of punctuation to indicate thought and use of exclamations to introduce speech.

During the study, I noticed that players use discourse particles such as well to introduce what they are going to say. For example:

7. 21:07:58 [Brigid]: well when you know what you want ... i got it :)

As shown in the example, the player has added the exclamation well to resemble to oral speech.

Another pattern that stands out is the use of ellipsis (…) in order to indicate a pause where the player seems to stop and think. For example:

8. 21:31:53 [Herkman]: OK Bubz will introduce a slight change of tactics.. basically the same but instad of 2 grps... its ONE caster grp.....

In this case the player added three ellipsis to make a pause that adds emphasises what is said afterwards.

As it has been observed throughout the material non-standard spelling is a common practice in WoWspk. Some words are produced to resemble pronunciation, such as gah, yup, ye, etc. Table 3 shows a list of all the words created by players for this purpose.
The most used pronunciation based words in my material were: bogof, cya, gah, gief, gota, heh, hehe, lawl, morning, nooo, nope, ure, y and ya.

Emoticons also play a very important role in WoWspeak. When communication does not take place face to face, the lack of body language is a handicap. This is why emoticons are so important when it comes to language in World of Warcraft. It is through emoticons that players are able to indicate, for example, when their message is ironic or sceptical.

The table below shows the ten most used emoticons in all the material gathered. The explanations have been gathered from Crystal (Crystal 2004). Not all emoticons were included in Crystal’s dictionary so the meaning has been deduced from other similar emoticons. For instance the emoticons ‘:)’ and ‘:-)’ are the same; the only difference is that the player decided to add nose to the emoticon a.

In some cases there was a space between the characters, for example ‘: )’ instead of ‘:)’. This difference has been omitted since the purpose of the emoticon remains the same with or without the space.

4. Discussion

4.1 Word formation

As the results of the study indicate, players use addition and compounding frequently. After analysing the processes it can be observed that they apply their linguistic instincts to form new words through affixation and compounding. One of the clearest examples is the use of the suffix –er to add the meaning ‘person who carries out the action’. I believe that one of the main reasons that players do this is to make language less robotic, as well as to cover the need for the term created.
Regarding reduction, it is clear that abbreviations and acronyms are very frequent in WoWspeak. I think that abbreviations and acronyms have different purposes. The first one is to make communication faster, the less there is to type, the less there is to read.
The second reason for the use of abbreviations and acronyms, especially the latter, is to emphasise. Crystal mentions that using capitals for a complete message indicates that the transmitter is shouting (Crystal 2001). I disagree with this position, for this material at least, I believe that in WoWspeak, the use of upper case indicates emphasis. I draw this conclusion from the fact that after analysing messages from the trade channel, general channel and guild chat, the use of acronyms in the trade chat is much more frequent. For example it stands out more if the message is: ‘LFM 3DPS ICC HC. /w me’, than if the message would be: ‘looking for three more members for Icecrown Citadel heroic mode. Whisper me.’ The message is shorter, clearer and overall more concrete.

As shown in the pie charts in section 3.1, the use of WoWspeak specific acronyms and abbreviations is much more frequent than the use of Standard English and L337 language ones. This proves that WoWspeak can be a jargon which overlaps with both Standard English and L337 language.

One of the main characteristics of L337 language is the use of ASCII characters in word formation. It is through these types of words that it can be said that WoWspeak derives from L337 language. The only difference between both, other than the specific terminology, is the function. L337 language was created to obfuscate certain topics and WoWspeak was created as a jargon of its own.

Innovation seems to be an obvious process of word formation for the player. Both Standard English and the game’s terminology fail to fulfil communication in all situations. For this reason, innovation offers the player a resource with which to create the terms he or she lacks. The general pattern seems to be that after creating a word, players also change its function. One of the best examples to show this is the acronym dps. It starts as an acronym, from the original ‘Damage Per Second’, and it evolves to become a common noun (The dps [damage] is too low), the person who carries out the noun (The dpser [person] did his job) and a verb (Dps [do damage] as much as you can).
4.2 Written speech

Overall, it seems that the pattern is to economise language, but, I believe that in many cases players try to reproduce speech. Due to this, I think that written speech is a key factor in WoWspeak.

When players use exclamations such as well, damn, etc, it is clear that they are trying to write as they would speak. It is through their written speech that they portray the personality.

Another technique players use to indicate written speech is punctuation marks. From the extracts analysed, it can be appreciated that some players use ellipsis to indicate a pause (where supposedly they are thinking), or to emphasise certain words. For example:

9. 21:12:58 [Brigid]: blue slot ... go for SP+SPI

10. 21:31:53 [Herkman]: OK Bubz will introduce a slight change of tactics .. basically the same but instad of 2 grps ... its ONE caster grp.....

As it is shown in example number seven, the player Brigid makes a pause between ‘blue slot’ and ‘go for SP + SPI’. This indicates that the player was thinking what would be best for the blue slot. In example number eight, the player makes two pauses before giving out the information to emphasise it.

One of the most important techniques used by players to carry out written speech is the use of pronunciation-based words. In some cases players write the words almost phonetically, for example gief, grienes and bogof,\(^6\) that represent ‘give’, ‘greens’ and ‘bug off’.

Another trait I would like to highlight is the way players indicate laughter. Since online communication does not allow showing physical emotions, they indicate laughter through words. Laughter is usually indicated with a combination of ‘h’ and the vowels ‘e’, ‘i’ and ‘a’. The length of this virtual laughter can vary. The more letters, the stronger the laughter seems to be. For example, if a player says hehe, he or she is just giggling, but if he or she types hahahahahaha he or she is having a laugh attack. It is \(^6\) Please note that no attempt was made to determine the mother tongue of the participants. Therefore, some of these spellings may be related to languages other than English.

also to be noted that this is not just a trait of WoWspeak, but also L337 language and virtual communication in general.

In order to compensate for not being able to show emotions through body language, players also use emoticons. Players do not just indicate their emotional state, but also the intentions of their message, with emoticons. For example, if a player adds ‘;’ at the end of their message it can mean that the player is joking. There would be no other way for other players to know this, since it is written communication that is not carried out face to face. In Appendix 4 there is a complete list of all the emoticons found and their meaning.

The same pattern that was seen with abbreviations and acronyms can also be seen with emoticons. Guild mode messages and raid mode messages have a tendency to contain more emoticons. The reason for this is that both guild and raid chat modes allow players to establish a closer relationship. Analysing the effect of this relationships in language is not the purpose of this study, but it could be a very interesting topic for further study.

After analysing the 998 messages in the material, it can be appreciated that some players swear, using words such as FFS (For Fuck’s Sake), more than others. This could be also an area for further research, since it seems that these players want to call for attention to themselves in some way or to appear “cooler” towards others.

5. Conclusion

This study shows that WoWspeak could be a variation of both L337 language and Standard English. It has specific word formations, capitalisation and use of written speech. Language used in MUDs has has evolved over time to form WoWspeak, a jargon of its own. This shows, as previous studies on this topic have indicated, that the differences between Standard English and WoWspeak are so significant that WoWspeak can be considered to be an independent jargon.

Many experts, like for example David Crystal (Crystal 2001), have concluded over time that one of the main characteristics of online communication is to make language more economic, but what I found to be most surprising is that WoWspeak could be one of the few exceptions. The study clearly shows that this is not the main purpose, or addition would not be part of the word formation process and players would not use exclamations and other “unnecessary” written speech features.

Despite all the findings, this study is limited in scope to be able to determine all factors that affect WoWspeak. Also, as I observed during the study, language use changed from one channel to another. For instance, the language used in the guild chat mode was much closer and more affectionate than the language used in the trade channel. Also, there was a significant amount of imperatives in the raid chat mode compared to the rest of channels/modes. These differences could be an interesting idea for future research on WoWspeak and online gaming language in general.

21:15:33 [Dominee]: 15 stam nt gona make u survive:
21:15:59 [Brigid]: but true ... stamina is never bad
21:16:03 [Eyebrow]: dps wise if the gem bouns the tear is better than others for blue
21:16:14 [Brigid]: but if spi is possible for like a lock ... it's better
21:16:27 [Ximaira]: mages can benefit from spirit too on blue gems
21:16:32 [Tyrión]: remmeber to dps the big ones when they're below 20%

21:36:21 [Ridikas]: 10 range
21:37:46 [Herkman]: bascially its same fight guys..... but instaed of 2 grps of casters.... we got ONE.....
21:38:08 [Herkman]: this means ONE spore will be a leftoever..so one has to stand by himself.....

21:38:56 [Ridikas]: wtb winsdom
21:38:57 [Herkman]: we have 4 healers outside... 3 hunters and 1 caster..... reason is we give dps'ers more chance to do more dps naturally
